For many organisations, the state of their employee's workplace relationships can very well make the difference between success and failure. When good workplace relationships are maintained, it is an asset to the organisation but when it is not, it is nothing but a liability to the company. Reason being, on a daily basis, a large majority of employees spend more hours with their colleagues as opposed to their own families. With huge chunk of their lives being spent at work with co-workers, it is crucial that a good workplace relationship with the team is established

It is easy to say that practicing good workplace relationship is a make or break for an organisation but it is important to specifically identify how and where it affects an organisation. With good workplace relationships, organisations can see employee morale greatly increase. When the morale of the employees is boosted, they are happier and more eager to work. It is a saying that a happy work force is a productive one and thus, organisations will see productivity increase. When productivity increases, it ultimately leads to the most important thing an organisation focuses on, profit. According to an article, strong relationships in the workplace are a major part of what makes an organisation function. Employees must frequently work together on projects, communicate ideas and provide motivation to get things done [CITATION Mat19 \l 1033].

Providing job satisfaction is a crucial importance of good workplace relationships. One of the most important ways of achieving job satisfaction is by not letting employees become bored with their jobs. Employees should be allowed to challenge their knowledge and develop their skills by being thought on how to do the job of a leader thus, expanding their knowledge and horizon [CITATION Wil17 \l 1033].
